"No-pets" policies do not apply

You must make an exception for them.

Federal, state, and local laws require that places normally open to the public must allow trained service animals to accompany people with disabilities onto the premises. This requirement applies to businesses, agencies, government offices and health clinics.

WHAT IS A SERVICE ANIMAL?

A service animal is any animal that has been trained to perform tasks for the benefit of a person with a disability.

Under the law, a service animal is not considered a pet. Dogs are the most common service animals, but other species (cats, birds, etc.) also can be service animals.

Service animals can perform many types of tasks for someone with a disability.

People with visual impairments use guide dogs. Other service animals are trained to alert a person who is deaf to sounds, to alert an individual with seizure disorder to an oncoming seizure, to carry and pick up things for someone who uses a wheelchair, or to help with balance.

There are no legal requirements for service animals to be specifically identified.

Some (but not all) service animals wear special collars and harnesses. Some (but not all) are licensed or "certified" and/or have identification papers.

⇒ Businesses cannot require a person with a disability to show proof of a disability or certification of a service animal's status.

You may ask a person with an animal if it is a service animal required because of a disability, if you are not certain that an animal is a service animal.

⇒ Businesses cannot restrict the areas where a service animal can go.

You must allow a service animal to accompany a person with a disability everywhere that other people normally are allowed to go, unless the animal's presence creates a basic change to your business operation or poses a threat to safety.

⇒ Businesses cannot restrict access to service animals because of health regulations.

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) takes priority over local or state laws or regulations.

⇒ Businesses are not responsible for a service animal while a person with a disability is on the premises.

Care or supervision of a service animal is solely the responsibility of the animal's owner.

⇒ Businesses may exclude a service animal from the premises when its behavior poses a direct threat to the health or safety of others.

You do not have to accommodate a service animal when doing so would result in a fundamental alteration to the nature of the business or pose a threat to safety.
